Seattle, Washington's Stoup Brewing has finished an expansion project that sees the opening of a 6,000 sq. ft. production space adjacent to the existing brewery and taproom. The Ballard neighborhood brewery has become a popular destination that's continually sought to find more room in their limited space.

More from a press release:

Located on the ground floor of a new building that sits directly behind Stoup's 2000 square foot beer garden, the new space has allowed the Stoup team to move all the bright tanks, keg washing, cold storage, and packaging out of the brewery.

Brewing remains in the original 3000 square foot space and with the addition of new fermenters, Stoup will ultimately triple production.

"We want to take things slow and not overextend ourselves right now," said Brad Benson, co-owner and head brewer. "But we do plan to focus on expanding our barrel aged program in the very near future."

"We also plan to be more than a draft only brewery," adds Robyn Schumacher, co-owner and brewer. "Our intention is to offer packaged beers in the first quarter of 2020."

"The new space is great for special projects we've been wanting to tackle," said Lara Zahaba, co-owner. "We're excited to start experimenting with more mixed culture and sour beers.”

In five short years, Stoup has gone from having three beers on tap to a rotating selection of 21, from making 24 different beers a year to 80, and from producing 1,700 barrels to 6,000. Stoup has also more than doubled their wholesale accounts.

In addition, they’ve been honored with numerous awards and accolades, and a loyal following. It’s very exciting to think about what they’ll create with an additional 6000 square feet of production space. Stay tuned!
